Then there was the fact that I would be the only girl working with the bridge crew. “If God had meant you to do a man’s work, he would have made you a man,” she said.

of all, the thing that made Mama Lil the most stubborn, was my dream of becoming an engineer. Mama Lil didn’t fully understand what an engineer was. I’d tried to explain it to her. I’d shown her my sketchbook full of drawings of city structures and machines. But Mama Lil didn’t know any engineers. She’d never seen one at work.

And to make matters worse, she’d asked her friends down at Rimley’s Beauty Parlor about engineering. They’d convinced her that I was headed down the wrong path. “Ain’t no black woman doing no en-gine-ing,” she’d said.

“Engineering,” I’d corrected.

In some respects, Mama Lil was right. It was true that there weren’t many black women engineers. I knew from the get-go that if I hoped to become an engineer, my road ahead would be lonely and hard. But I wanted to build bridges more than anything.

A week passed. A week of Mama Lil and I not speaking about the bridge project, or the permission form. It was due—signed by her—in four days. That’s when the renovation was supposed to begin.

On the Saturday night before the project was to start, Mama Lil did something that got me real mad. She brought home a summer job application from Rimley’s Beauty Parlor. “Bebe, I went and done you a big favor,” she said. “Vernice Rimley needs somebody to sweep hair and clean her sinks. She can’t pay you nothing to start, but you’d get a heap of training. By next summer you’d be doing perms and manicures, and getting tips on top of a regular salary. And you could even bring your paper tablet. You could draw during your breaks.”

Mama Lil put the application down on the coffee table. “Bebe, if you put your mind to it, you could be awfully good at doing hair. Give it a chance, child,” she urged.

My forehead and upper lip grew moist with the sweat that anger brings on. “Mama Lil,” I began, “look at me.”

But Mama Lil lit a cigarette. She inhaled, then closed her eyes to release a stream of smoke. “I’m enjoying my cig, Bebe,” she said. “It tastes better with my eyes closed.”

I leaned in the doorway, my anger rising. “Mama Lil, your eyes are always closed. Closed to seeing me.” I said. “I don’t want to spend my summer sweeping hair. The bridge is where my heart’s at, Mama Lil.”

She was doing her best to tune me out. “Yeah, that’s right,” I said, my voice strained with frustration. “Try to make me and my dreams disappear, like your puffs of smoke!”
